Chuck Jones looks back, in words and illustrations in this autobiography, from an age of 84 years and tells his story with humor, openness, and illustration. One might think that he was richly compensated for the joy and laughter he brought into millions of households, but, at the end of his career, he was all but flat broke. But he did have his story to tell, and it is worth both seeing and reading. He not only paints a picture of studio life in the early years of Hollywood, and the tremendous camaraderie and fun enjoyed by him and colleagues, but also the inspiration for each of his characters Jones, Chuck (1996). Chuck Reducks: Drawing from the Fun Side of Life. New York: Warner Books. ISBN 0-446-51893-X. Early on, Bugs discusses the wild villains he had co-starred with in his cartoons, which is followed by a tongue-in-cheek sequence depicting the history of comedy and a scene in which Bugs discusses his "several fathers". The latter scene was written by Chuck Jones as a way to debunk fellow animation director Robert Clampett's claims throughout the 1970s that he alone created Bugs, and Clampett's name is notably missing from Bugs's list, as a result of the conflict between Jones and Clampett.

â€” Chuck Jones, Chuck Reducks, Drawing from the Fun Side of Life. Filmography (all Jones, except where noted): Odor-able Kitty (1945).Â  Chuck says in his â€œChuck Reducksâ€ that he created nearly 1500 storyboards for this film plus the hundreds produced by the Maurice Noble and the writers. He traveled with 600 of them around the country pitching the half-hour television show until he found a sponsorâ€“CBS wouldnâ€™t â€˜buyâ€™ the animation without a sponsor attached.
