New Zealand has just set a great example to the world by recognizing what animal lovers have known forever- that our furry friends are as sentient as we are, and (obviously, dur) they have feelings just like we do. Itâ€™s a theme we have covered time and again, but this landmark ruling by NZ is the first time this shift in perception and policy has been extended to all animals, not just chimpanzees, orangutans, or dolphins.Â  Beeâ€™s are especially intellegent. Insects are considered animals. Reply. Leave a CommentÂ  New Zealand drops huge amounts of 1080 to kill pests such as possums and rats. Unfortunately, this has been going on for 60 years and kills pets, stock, and thousands of native birds. The Department of Conservationâ€™s activities are outside this Act.

No New Zealand native animal list would ever be complete without mentioning the country's most famous bird. The kiwi (always lowercase, unless you're talking about humans) is quite an interesting little bird: it's flightless, can live between 25 to 50 years, has hair-like feathers, and has strong legs but no tail. Archaeological evidence points to the fact that native sea lions were once found along the entire length of New Zealand's coast, from the North Island right down to Stewart Island and the sub-antarctic islands, too. Unfortunately, a population decline has meant that nowadays these majestic marine mammals are mostly confined to the Otago and Southland regions and the sub-antarctic islands.
